Vincenzo Gemito's Head of a Philosopher was cast around 1886, when he was working in his own foundry financed by De Mesnil. The philosopher's head from the Achille Minozzi collection, now owned by the Capodimonte Museum in Naples, dates from c.1883-1886. It was presented at the Petit Palais in Paris and then at the Capodimonte Museum for an exhibition on Gemito held in 2019.

One of the main inspirations for Gemito's Philosopher's Head was the portrait of the pseudo-Seneca in the Archaeological Museum of Naples. However, the artist's most important reference in depicting his subject was his adoptive father, Francesco Jadicco, nicknamed 'Masto Ciccio', whom he portrayed several times in sketches and drawings.

In the present lot, the incisive chiseling outlines the details of the face, the hair and the beard. It delineates the wrinkles around the character's eyes with greater insistence and highlights his teeth. The details imitate reality and are undoubtedly closer to the faithful representation of the face of 'Masto Ciccio', his adoptive father and the main source of inspiration for this work. Nevertheless, even in this version the reference to antiquity is present.
